Impact related publications

I am highly engaged in impact work, alongside traditional academic output. Key contributions listed below include a 2019 report for the Migration Policy Institute in Washington D.C. on Australia's economic immigration programme, which informed executive debate on skilled immigration across Europe and North America. I have contributed to most of the major domestic immigration policy debates in Australia since 2014, as well as being invited to contribute to research and work undertaken by the OECD, International Organisation for Migration and UN Women on gender and skilled immigration policy.

TEACHING

I hold a Postgraduate Certificate in Higher Education from the London School of Economics. This is a British-recognised postgraduate-level qualification on tertiary-level education theory and practice. I have won a teaching award for my innovative, experimental design research on lecture recordings (in 2012) and have presented this research before the Deputy Vice Chancellor for Education at the University.

I am active in the teaching space at the University of Sydney. I was the School of Social and Political Science Undergraduate Coordinator in 2016-2017 during the first wave of the Curriculum Transformation Process and have since acted in the departmental undergraduate role, where I have been responsible for rolling out this new curriculum across political science and international relations. I led efforts across my school in the development and adoption of all new majors and fourth year options, the drafting and submission of new learning thresholds, the development of a three-year plan for the new curriculum and the establishment of a new stream in Politics and International Relations (2016-2018). I also sat on the faculty-level Undergraduate Committee (2016). I worked with Chair, Professor Annamarie Jagose (now Provost), on a separate Faculty Interdisciplinary Committee to create a methodologically robust staff and student consultation process around a interdisciplinary unit for senior undergraduate students that has now been rolled out across the faculty.

SERVICE, LEADERSHIP AND GOVERNANCE

I am active in service to my disciplines of public policy and political science within the University, domestically and internationally. I am frequently invited to review for journals, grants and selection committees. I am active in arranging and leading conferences. In 2020, I stood as Section President in Migration and Citizenship for the American Political Science Association Conference. I am a Research Lead for the James Martin Institute at the University of Sydney, that fosters policy links with the NSW government. I formally mentor two early career researchers in my field and informally many others. My record attests to active collegiality in my field both domestically and internationally.

Service to the Community

I am actively engaged in real world public policy through my role as an immigration adviser to government during major policy reviews. In 2019 I was flown to Chile by the Australian government to advise APEC member states on gender and immigration statistics. I have been called before closed and open parliamentary and Senate sessions on immigration and labour market reform, most recently for a Draft Exposure Bill addressing wage theft. I enjoy strong relationships with senior policy advisors in the Departments of Home Affairs, Employment, Skills, Small and Family Business, Treasury, Industry, Innovation and Science, the Fair Work Ombudsman, Australian Parliamentary Library and Premier and Cabinet (NSW). Some, non-exhaustive instances of advice and consultations are listed here.
